Not illustrated. 1875 edition. Excerpt: ... As soon as we were sighted approaching the encampment, great excitement prevailed. Evidently we had penetrated beyond the ordinary range of travellers. Making for the middle of the settlement, Ali, who put himself between my companion and myself, rode straight up for the purpose of introducing us in due form to the chieftain of this powerful tribe; who advanced to receive us, touching his breast, when Ali tendered the familiar salutation: God is great, and Mahommed is his prophet. On our dismounting, the sheikh was somewhat puzzled to discover who was the greater man of the two, Mr. P. or I; but Mr. P. (on my suggestion) being indicated as the swell of the party, he lavished his attentions upon him. The very best coffee was prepared for us, the sheikh himself roasting the berries and pounding them for the special occasion. The final touch of polite consideration came when he laboriously unwound a dozen wraps of cloth off a package, which turned out to be a piece of white sugar, off which he broke two small bits. The addition of sugar to our coffee was considered an immense, almost unheard of, luxury. This chief was certainly an Ethiopian. He was almost black, and of majestic presence, and the tribe are greatly attached to him, though how he managed his election to the headship of so important a Bedouin tribe is to me inexplicable. He had been to Cairo, where he referred to the rule of Abbas Pasha, and he had evidently escaped into Moab. He luxuriated in the possession of three nice wives, by whom he had three sons, who were fine fellows. The tribe itself was very ugly, a lot of most determined-looking scoundrels, who would have forbidden sleep but for my being thoroughly tired out., The chief ordered a
