

Post-genocide narratives of reconciliation in Rwanda (Europa Perspectives in Transitional Justice)

Post-genocide Narratives of Reconciliation in Rwanda develops a narrative approach to reconciliation, with Rwanda as case study. Many books on Rwanda have focused on a high level analysis of the political context of the country, while many others have, in a less academic register, explored the stories of ordinary people. This book, with a particular focus on reconciliation, uniquely brings together the official government narratives of reconciliation with the personal narratives of ordinary people. Drawing from fieldwork in Rwanda that has spanned almost ten years Post-genocide Narratives of Reconciliation in Rwanda explores the negative potential of narratives, through Rwandas pre-genocide, genocide and post-genocide periods, as well as the positive potential of narratives in Rwandas reconciliation process. Reconciliation has become an integral part of post conflict recovery processes which are largely facilitated by high level actors. For this reason, an approach that examines the intersection between personal and official narratives seems pertinent in order to better understand reconciliation processes. The theoretical framework draws from both narrative and reconciliation theory, and a narrative theory of reconciliation is thoroughly developed. This title will appeal to specialists interested in Africa, the Great Lakes region and more specifically, Rwanda, as well as those interested in reconciliation, transitional justice and post conflict recovery processes. Because the book explores the narratives of ordinary people, non-academics may also be interested.
