Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: ...Hes kept us till now, my man. Hell keep us to th end; and from both their hearts went up the silent prayer, May it be soon--soon! Peter piled some of his choicest bits of wood on the fire, pieces which his experienced eye told him held prisoners the most variegated flames. He got ready their evening meal--literally meal, for it consisted only of a bowl of porridge for each of them. But Love stirred the pan and Love fed the helpless one on the bed; and better both for body and soul is such a bowl of porridge than the repletion of a Lord Mayors banquet. They talked long together that night, and rambled back into the past, while the one sipped a very small cup of the Reverend Eustaces tea without any milk, and the other smoked a pipe of the Reverend Eustaces tobacco. If his advice was not always to their minds, his little gifts contained elements of consolation, and they thought kindly thoughts of him which would do him no harm. The wild northeaster bellowed at them down the chimney, and puffed the sweet wood-smoke rudely into the room. Outside, the restless sand whirled ceaselessly along the fiats and sifted in below the door; the sandhills behind got up and crept about in the dark, and changed places and faces to such an extent that the very rabbits would hardly know their way about in the morning. Inside, there was peace passing the ordinary understanding. It was so very good to be together, and there was in them a grateful sense of peril passed and danger averted; and when at last the old man drew out from under his wifes bed the six sacks of dried grass and rushes on which he always slept on the floor alongside her, if their stomachs were not overfull their hearts were. If they lacked much, they had one another. If the probl...
